Its actual speed, therefore, may be faster or slower than that of t he generator; but it is 55 said to be synchronous so long as it preserves the same relative speed. In carrying out my invention I construct a motor which has a strong tendency to synchronism with the generator. The construe-60 tion which I prefer fot this is that in which the armature is provided with polar proiection- (tions. The field-magnets are wound with two sets of coils, the terminals of which are connected to a switch mechanism, by means of 65 which the line-current may be carried directly through the said coils or indirectly through paths by which its phases are modified. To start such a motor, the switch is turned onto a set of contacts which includes in one motor-70 circuit a dead resistance, in the other an inductive resistance, and, the two circuits being in derivation, it is obvious that the difference in phase of the current in such circuits will set up a rotation of the motor. When the 75 speed of the motor has thus been brought to the desired rate, the switch is shifted tothrow the main current directly through the motorcircuits, and although the currents in both circuits will now be of the same phase the 80 motor will continue to revolve, becoming a true synchronous motor. To secure greater efficiency, I wind thearmature or its polar projections with coils closed on themselves....
