Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Optical Defects in School Children: An Address Before the Massachusetts Teachers Association at Its Annual Meeting, October 17, 1868 I would show, also, that the threatened misfortunes must be averted through the intelligence and vigilance of teachers; since, in many instances, the pupil himself will make no complaint, but will even be unconscious of the dangers he is incurring till the mischief is beyond repair. Within a very few years, great advances have been made in a knowledge of the optical conditions necessary to perfect vision, and of the causes which disturb the normal exercise of this function. Till recently, much uncertainty existed as to whether the imperfect sight, or inability to use the eyes, frequently complained of, depended on optical defects or on organic structural changes. But the invention of the ophthalmoscope by means of which we are able to illuminate and explore the interior of the eye, has made it possible at once to detect the latter, besides aiding in determining the presence of the former. It shows, moreover, in certain cases, the...
