Excerpt: .agriculture, mining, transportation, and the like. The importance of this phase of the investigation will appear when it is remembered that scientific education has proved the most potent influence for overcoming superstition, and that only through science can production be so increased as to furnish the means for the support of the educational system which China undoubtedly needs. Mr. Burton and Mr. Chamberlin will meet in Pekin in February and will then, though probably taking different routes through China, carry on their work in co-operation. High officials of the United States government have already expressed their interest in this undertaking on the part of the University, and the co-operation of both educators and officials in China is already practically assured. What results may follow this investigation is, of course, wholly uncertain. The University has studiously avoided committing itself to anything except a thorough study...
